2010 RURAL HOSPITAL REPLACEMENT FACILITY STUDY

How Replacement Facilities Impact Operations and the Bottom Line: Findings from the Field

The 2010 rural hospital replacement facility will be published in several parts, each with a specific focus. This first part, Part One, examines the make-up of the communities that have successfully completed a replacement facility. Many Boards ask, "Are we different than the communities with replacement facilities?" and this publication offers data to help rural leaders make this assessment. The 2010 study includes 97 rural hospitals that have replaced patient care areas and opened their new facilities prior to January I, 2010, with a list of those facilities included in this report. For each hospital in the study, Stroudwater analyzed service area characteristics including population size and growth, household income, unemployment, and insurance coverage as well as each new facility's distance in both miles and minutes to the nearest hospital, the utilization of services as measured by Medicare admissions per I,000 population over age 65, and each hospital's market share of Medicare admissions for its service area. (The study did not look at data from communities that have not replaced facilities, but past versions of this study have shown similar demographic characteristics between replacement and non-replacement communities.)

The results show there is no "typical" replacement community. The communities with replacement facilities are diverse, and there are no strong links between the factors one might assume would be determinant: population size, household income, unemployment rates, hospital utilization, or market share. Some of these communities are isolated, small, and relatively poor, while others are in more populated areas with significant competition.

Within the data however some patterns do emerge. In the area of population growth (or decline), for example, the smallest quarter of communities, all with service area populations less than IO,000, are more likely to be losing population, while the largest communities are showing the most growth. Nearly all communities are experiencing growth in the 65+ population, but this age cohort is growing fastest in those larger communities.

Hospitals in the smaller communities are generally more distant from the next nearest hospital and hospitals in the larger communities still generally command a larger market share of Medicare inpatient admissions. Additionally, larger service areas generally have lower percentages of uninsured populations.

The combination of a small and shrinking population, lower growth in the 65+ population, and a high percentage of uninsured patients presents a large challenge for small, rural communities. Larger rural communities face more competition from adjacent facilities and must define their service mix carefully. To sustain any facility investment, the facility must meet the needs of the community and be responsive to these challenges.

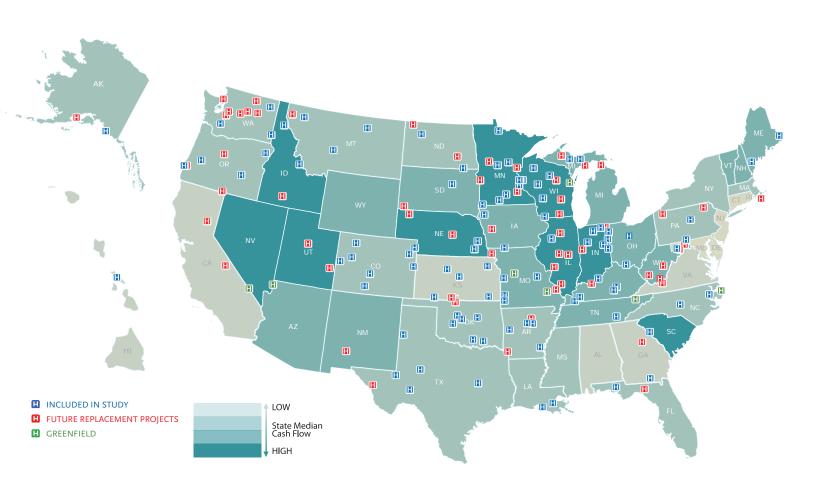

In conclusion, there is no minimum size or pre-defined demographic to support rural facility investments. More and more rural hospitals are considering facility investments – in communities both large and small – and should be looking at all options.

Part Two of the study will examine the impact of replacement on hospitals' financial performance.
